Subsequent to the alarming news that hit the wires in Squamish, BC early Monday, sources report that Mountain FM Radio 107.1, aired an update that the SPCA and RCMP of Canada visited the Sea to Sky Stables and found no signs of abuse or neglect.

It's unclear as to the fate of the horses that may be sold for slaughter this week end. An anonymous source states that the conditions at the stables have been ongoing and that authorities may or may not discover the situation with just one visit. Local Canadian horse advocates remain concerned, and they hope authorities will continue to monitor the situation.

Pro-Horse advocates encourage stable owners to release their retiring horses to rescue organizations instead of selling them off to the cruel slaughter pipeline. Funds are donated by people who oppose horse slaughter for rescue operations/ purchasing slaughter bound horses; most of which are young and healthy. Advocates point out that stable owners and others in the horsemanship industry that are constantly criticized for profiting from the sordid practice of horse slaughter can instead benefit from viable alternatives and at the same time gain much recognition and admiration by the public for responsible efforts that would help to put an end to the cruel slaughter of horses.
