Protective Legislation for Equines

Before the year 2007, three major equine slaughterhouses operated in the United States... Dallas Crown, Kaufman, Texas, Beltex, Fort Worth, Texas, and Cavel International, DeKalb, Illinois. All were Belgian owned.

During the 109th Congress, the House of Representatives considered legislation to ban the slaughter of horses for human consumption and to stop the exportation of horses for slaughter elsewhere. With numerous sponsors, HR 503 passed the House overwhelmingly just to be squelched once it reached the Senate.

In 2006 Congress put language in an Agriculture Appropriations Bill that cut off funding for horse meat inspections as a short term fix, until a federal ban could be passed. The USDA then attempted to get horse slaughter plants to fund their own inspections, but the U.S. District Court ruled that it's ILLEGAL for horse slaughter plants to pay the USDA for their own health inspections. This effectively shut down horse slaughter in the U.S.

Pro slaughter lobbyists have mounted vigorous opposition insisting that animals constitute private property and that banning slaughter is an unconstitutional restraint of trade. But a three-judge panel on the U.S. Court of Appeals ruled that banning horse slaughter for human consumption IS constitutional.

The original sponsors of HR 503 reintroduced amended bills in the 110th and 111th congress, known as The Prevention of Equine Cruelty Act. But select politicians and lobbyists have effectively been able to block the passage of these bills. Proponents continue to push to reopen horse slaughter plants in the U.S. under the influence of deep pocket foreign interests.

Unable to slaughter horses in the U.S., the industry opened new slaughter plants in Canada and Mexico, where our American horses have continuously been exported for slaughter to this day.
